In our discussion of his defense, we learned that defense counsel decided to lead witnesses on the stand based on what he perceived as weaknesses in their direct examination. He would not at that point vigorously cross-examine witnesses to elicit testimony favorable to his case. However, we found several instances that demonstrated his staunch advocacy for his client. Because of his deft cross-examination of the State's witnesses, he was able to establish weaknesses and uncertainties in the State's case. In the opening statement, he told the jury about the discrepancies between Jackson's statements in the initial confession and trial testimony. Defense counsel also argued that Jackson's inability to remember the details of the crimes made the State's case weak. He also stated that Jackson's "possible lack of truthfulness" should be considered by the jury. Of course, Jackson's purported inability to remember the crimes may have resulted from his memory being refreshed in the courtroom. The principal weakness in the State's case was the testimony of the three female employees. When these witnesses were questioned at trial, they admitted that Jackson had made certain comments to them in July 1977 about how easy he made the job of the victim. According to the witnesses, it was not until they noticed Jackson's car outside the store on August 1, 1977, that he was identified as the robber. The defense also questioned their motives for reporting the crimes. In order to rehabilitate the witnesses, the trial court instructed the jury that certain evidence was to be considered only in evaluating the credibility of the witnesses. In doing so, the court used nonidentifying language that was intended to avoid prejudice to Jackson. Had the defense counsel objected to the instruction, a mistrial may have been required. However, as we have explained in our discussion of Jackson's other challenges, this instruction did not constitute reversible error in

Free The Umbrella Academy 3 Coming to Netflix on January 15th We've been waiting patiently for the day that The Umbrella Academy returns to Netflix. How long can you patiently wait? Not very long, apparently, as the third season of the comedy is due to release on January 15th. The streaming service announced the news via Twitter with a short promo clip of the series, which follows up with three superheroes dealing with their problems by living in New York City - but when they realize that someone is stalking them, they band together to take on the shadowy organization they're trying to fight and find an answer to the mystery surrounding their parentage. As Netflix doesn't provide much information regarding the release date or other details pertaining to the third season, we'll have to wait until we see the holiday 2015 break to learn what's going on. In the meantime, here's the official trailer for the series' third season. We're sure there are some fans out there looking forward to getting a look at the third season of The Umbrella Academy, and we'll be keeping an eye out for any news regarding it. In the meantime, be sure to catch up on the two seasons you can watch right now on Netflix.

Rule #1 For Running A Race That Won't Kill You: Don't Do It I'm no stranger to running, I race, I coach, and, of course, I run blogs. Yet, if I'm being honest with myself, I've probably only won a handful of races I've started. That's a lot less than the number of races I've ended. And, like many before me, I've learned the hard way. It doesn't take much to ruin a race. It takes a lot to ruin a good race. For the last few years I've had a mantra: "If I die doing this, it's not gonna be at my own hand." At a time like this, it's easy to think of ways that you could kill yourself in your training or in a race. Last week, when I starting running at a higher
