A critical flaw in the browser and PC operating system has left millions of Chrome users vulnerable to the WannaCry ransomware, according to analysis by security researcher security specialist Mikko Hypponen. WannaCry's command-and-control (C&C) server was visible to the public between 12.12 and 13.12 April. When a user's computer connected to the infected server, it downloaded a copy of the ransomware from a pre-existing public server and installed it on the machine. The flaw that allowed WannaCry to spread was in the Internet Explorer (IE) browser on 64-bit systems, and only on Windows XP and Windows Server 2003 systems, according to Hypponen. September 03, 2010 Fun Friday Flashback This is an older posting but one that still brings a smile to my face. A guy named Jim yells "Up On Delmar!" from his yellow U-Haul truck when I pull up to the Sears parking lot. I suddenly feel like an awkward, overcompensated 17-year-old walking home alone from high school in the dark. Another guy named Charlie punches an old lady's stomach in the crowded food court, "Sucks to be you," he says. "You better run fast if you're hiding out here. We'll find you!" I hustle out and locked my bike up in a garage (I'd parked it behind an office) and spent some time clearing my head. I was hot and tired. Never have I seen so many people standing around talking about sports in places like Nashville. I was right in the middle of their universe. As I walked toward my bike, up on Delmar Street, the barometer dropped a few degrees. The humidity hit and the air took on a scent of water vapor and sweat and sandal grease and body odor. Thousands and thousands of people - sweating, smooching, coke sniffing, society folks, kids milling about, dressed to the nines. Bikers stood around offering quarters - cash, for backing U-Hauls. I passed two gay guys with handmade signs: "Tattoo 'I' Love You' $2" and "Dickhead $5," I smiled, thinking of my 18-year-old self. I read a few newspaper headlines and one proclaimed: "City Guide to the Super bowl." I switched channels from channel five to Fox to get a game on my T-V so I could watch as a side dish. Around sixth street, the lights looked like the Black Hole in 2001: A Space Odyssey. Naked, shrieking women appeared, dancing their asses off. I counted eight or nine cops milling
