From the rooftop of the Toronto police garage complex at Queens Quay and Spadina Avenue, Queensway is visible in the distance. It's a scene that has earned the collection of buildings some gritty attention as it's ripe for the taking. It's the view that's so accessible, so within a stone's throw of the busy Spadina subway station. Built in the 1850s, the oldest of the three buildings — the one facing west — is just as is the other two. The one on the left, facing north, has a similar facade to the one that can be found at the other end of the complex. Together, the three buildings form something of a triangle. All told, the complex is a relic that was once a hub of the city's transit system. Even now, though, those buildings and their stories are changing. Loading... Loading... Loading... Loading... Loading... At the end of 2012, the site was home to a mixed-use apartment complex. It was small but growing. Then, in 2014, a deal went down that would split the complex into a private condo and rental unit development. The buildings got the retail finish some characters never bothered with when they were apartments. A green rooftop. A new facade. But, what's not on the surface is the economics of what has happened to the site.

Aging in the human body is closely related to the degeneration of the enterocyte. Ginsenoside Rg1, which is the most abundant compound in ginseng, may protect against oxidative stress and aging. The authors' previous studies have shown that ginsenoside Rg1 attenuates oxidative stress in the kidney. The objective of this study was to determine whether ginsenoside Rg1 protects the intestinal epithelial cells from oxidative stress in the intestine. The pyloric ligament of rats was used as a model for investigating the protective effects of ginsenoside Rg1 on the enterocytes. After removal of the pyloric ligament, the rats were fed a normal diet or a diet containing 0.1% or 0.2% ginsenoside Rg1 for 6 weeks. Compared with the normal diet, 0.2% ginsenoside Rg1 increased the expression of heat shock protein 70 (Hsp70), glutathione (GSH), and the GSH/GSSG ratio and protected the cells from H(2)O(2) induced injury. In addition, ginsenoside Rg1 also enhanced the adenosine triphosphate (ATP) content and improved the activity of the ATP synthase. In addition, LY294002, a phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase (PI3K) inhibitor, and HSP70 siRNA attenuated the beneficial effects of ginsenoside Rg1 may be a candidate for future drug development to treat enterocyte damage related to age and oxidative stress.Q: Why do some people say that "guizzing is a waste of time"?
